detailed section perspective

The Jim Thompson site was filled with tall grass and trees that cover the plots of land. Through time, we are imagining that the land changes throughout the season. It started as a field of gold due to the dry climate and it will become green during the wet season.

The idea was to create a set of studio and residences that didn't destroy the landscape, but it touches it lightly. This is done through preserving the existing context and slightly flattening zones within the complex in order for circulation. Over time, the boundary will change over time with new grassing growing and filling in the gaps.

Through very open and simple wood framed houses seen in the plans model, and section, it isn't just responding to the very harsh climate, but it is also bringing in the landscape both visually and physically.

The inside is somehow also the outside and vice versa with the continuous paths made of stone, the exterior conditions seeping into the spaces, the artist can experience very different settings depending on the time of the year hence our project:

To feel legitimate, the state and its leader, even though the state is secular, need to be blessed by the church.
